ABOUT FDP

Recent coronavirus pandemic has not only caused the severe health and humanitarian challenges, businesses around the world are also facing enormous challenges: collapse of customer demand, significant regulatory modifications, supply chain interruptions, unemployment, economic recession, and increased uncertainty. Companies are discovering that the situation is fundamentally different from the more traditional business continuity threats and certainly cannot be dealt with the existing business continuity plans. Companies need to develop rigorous contingency plans to slow the progress of a pandemic and limit its impact on employees, shareholders, partners, consumers, and communities. This requires that business leaders and employees possess a skill-set to deal with such situations and can come-up with the innovative working styles rather than simply checking the existing business continuity plans. This is something, which the faculty development programme plans to address to allow the academic leaders rethink on their teaching methodology and content, with a more focused approach to industry requirements in such situations.
